The intermittency and uncertainty surrounding COVID-19 relief programs have been problematic in finding solutions to homelessness and hunger, which all experts agree are long-term problems we need to make Biden’s actions a game-changer, if achieved.

For people who were already precarious, the pandemic worsened that danger. Unhoused people are disproportionately affected by health conditions that can make coronavirus cases more severe, and are often forced to shelter, eat, and access hygiene in inappropriate places, where social distance is difficult to maintain.

The Board of Directors and the Office of Sustainability at the University of Nebraska–Lincoln, and Nebraska Recycling Council have taken up the challenge of making UNL zero waste.

Homelessness is a Problem We Can Solve

The pandemic has exacerbated growing issues surrounding homelessness.

For people who were already precarious, the pandemic worsened that danger. Unhoused people are disproportionately affected by health conditions that can make coronavirus cases more severe, and are often forced to shelter, eat, and access hygiene in inappropriate places, where social distance is difficult to maintain.
